MORE CONVICTIONS
-----

11. (SBU) A reliable source has reported that an additional 24 political detainees have been convicted since November 7, in addition to the 17 convictions we reported reftel. This brings the number of political detainees convicted in the past week to at least 41, all of whom received prison sentences of between two and 65 years. We are also seeking to confirm reports that an additional nine Muslim activists from Rakhine State were sentenced to prison on November 11. Some of these convictions have been reported in the exile and international press, but so far the official Burmese media has remained silent.

12. (C) On November 13 Human Rights Defenders and Promoters (HRDP) member Maung Maung Lay provided us with a list of those persons he confirmed the regime has convicted (see para 4). He and other HRDP members obtained this information by speaking with family members and personally visiting Insein prison on November 11 and 12. Maung Maung Lay noted that several of his fellow HRDP members are on that list, and said he believes more arrests and convictions may be on the way. He pledged to continue to document convictions of political detainees despite the personal risk he must undertake to do so.

COMMENT
-----

13. (SBU) The list of those confirmed convicted includes pro-democracy activists, human rights workers, labor advocates, monks, an internet blogger, a musician, and a poet. Some of those convicted participated in the August and September 2007 peaceful protests. Others worked to document human rights abuses in the wake of the crackdown. Some, like poet Saw Wai, merely expressed their opinions about the regime. For all their differences, these individuals have one thing in common: they peacefully advocated change and, in so doing, earned the ire of this regime. End Comment.
